

Droplet-based microfluidics

This talk will present advances in the use of microfluidics to manipulate droplets. These droplets can be used as micro-reactors, with volumes between femto and pico liters, that can be used for very high throughput screening for biological assays. The droplets can also be used as templates to make new materials. Several different opportunities will be discussed.

Prof. David A. Weitz

Harvard University